

CHAPTER V

CONCLUSION

In the foregoing chapters an attempt has been made to establish a rationale for regional planning and to provide guides which will make commission formation and operation less confusing and less difficult. Unfortunately, it is not possible either to foresee every situation which can possibly arise in regional planning; or to discuss every conceivable alternative open to commissions as they organize and begin functioning.

Perhaps, then, the best that has been accomplished in this manual is to present most typical and most common occurrences and discussions related to them. The most usual organization concerns, funding possibilities, limitations of powers, assignment of responsibilities and questions about staff and consultants have formed the basis for this manual.

But the uniqueness of every commission and every jurisdiction and the creativeness of every commissioner will always bring about adaptations to find the best ways of working in any situation. The adaptations perhaps will be made easier and better by the contents of this manual.
